

Building Better Outcomes For Work and For Life with Project Management Training

UofL's Project Management Certificate program is helping professionals learn a new skill set that can help them build better outcomes in their personal and professional lives.

Christine Vaughan is the marketing projects and event manager for a start-up with a small team and limited resources. In order to grow, the organization needed to implement more processes and structure. Vaughan was in a position to lead the charge.

Vaughan's supervisor worked with her to determine that project management training could help provide Vaughan with tools and knowledge necessary to put more structure in place in their organization.

When searching for project management programs, Vaughan sought a program that included practical application from a reputable organization.

"What attracted me to UofL is that I could come in and do an actual course, meet new people, and have practical application and experience...I've been through some other courses with UofL and I appreciated the content so I decided that this was the best place for me," she shared.

H. Ray Pait, Jr., a senior director for safety and security at Churchill Downs Racetrack, also decided to seek out additional project management training from UofL. One of the reasons he enrolled in the UofL's project management program was to learn how to communicate better with construction vendors.

"The program helped me to be able to understand the formalized language I would hear when we'd bring vendors in," Pait explained. "It made life easier for all of us to be able to talk on the same level. The program gave me a thorough understanding of the core values of what they did, from a project perspective."
